ABSTRACT

A guide to help students select possible study-abroad programs is presented. The programs are sponsored by recognized U.S. colleges and universities during the academic year and offer U.S. academic credit. Most of the programs fall into three basic categories: (1) the program that combines study in a foreign institution with courses arranged for the group; (2) the program fully integrated into a foreign university or other university-level institution; and (3) courses taught by faculty of the sponsoring institution. Entries include the name and address of the sponsoring school and brief information on the following points: year the program was established; program location; dates and/or duration of the program; pre-session orientation locales and procedures; enrollment restrictions; fields of study; academic level; credits awarded; prerequisites; whether students attend regular academic courses at a foreign institution or special courses for foreign students, and/or courses arranged for the group and taught by U.S. and/or foreign faculty; teaching methods; language of instruction; housing; costs; scholarships; work/study opportunities; and program evaluation. ABOUT IIE

The Institute of International Education (IIE), a private nonprofit organization, is the oldest (founded 1919) and largest international educational agency in the United States. It has headquarters in New York City and a Washington, DC office; regional offices in Atlanta, Chicago, Denver, Houston, and San Francisco; and overseas offices in Zimbabwe (Harare), Hong Kong, Thailand (Bangkok), Indonesia (Jakarta), and Mexico (Mexico City).

IIE manages sponsored programs which assist 7,000 people each year through fellowships and grants. The Institute also conducts contribution-supported educational services, which include information services, student counseling, publications, and professional services to the campus study abroad adviser, foreign student adviser, and admissions officer. Contributions to the Institute are tax-deductible.

INTRODUCTION

This volume is intended as a guide to help the student make a preliminary selection of possible study-abroad programs. The programs listed are all sponsored by recognized U.S. colleges and universities during the academic year—generally between late September and early June. All offer regular U.S. academic credit. However, the acceptance of academic credit for transfer is always the prerogative of the accepting (or rejecting) school. The student who wishes to receive academic credit for work done abroad must check with his or her home institution about its own requirements before undertaking a study-abroad program sponsored by another school.

It is essential that the student write to the sponsoring institutions—not to IIE—for further information well in advance of the application deadlines given.

This book does not include:

- Programs to be held only in the summer months. These are listed in The Learning Traveler, Vol. II, Vacation Study Abroad, a companion volume to this book published annually by IIE (cost U.S. $9.95, overseas $14). This book of academic-year programs does list programs in which a period of summer study is an integral part of a longer program. It also identifies programs which have summer sessions in which students may enroll without attending academic-year sessions.

- Study-abroad programs sponsored solely by private U.S. or foreign organizations which are not degree-granting U.S. institutions. A number of the programs listed are cosponsored by U.S. institutions and private organizations. In these cases, the programs are listed with the name of the U.S. institution as the primary sponsor. Programs sponsored by consortia of U.S. institutions are generally listed under the name of the consortium.

There are a number of privately sponsored study centers and programs abroad. Some U.S. institutions will give academic credit, on an individual basis, to their own students who take courses there. Students interested in these programs should consult their academic advisers on their home campuses. The Bibliography, beginning on page 203, includes the names of books which contain information on programs of this sort.

- Interim programs. A number of U.S. colleges and universities offer three-week or four-week programs abroad during interim sessions, usually in January, for academic credit. These programs almost always offer instruction by U.S. faculty members accompanying the student group. Most, though not all, consist of study-tours of several countries with emphasis on a single subject, e.g., drama or cuisine or antiques.

CHOOSING A STUDY-ABROAD PROGRAM

The rewards of foreign study are both academic and personal, not necessarily in that order. Individual U.S. college-sponsored programs abroad differ as much as the sponsoring schools do—even more, in many cases, because the focus of a program can change from year to year. What a student will get out of a particular program depends, as always, as much on the student as on the program.

Types of Programs

Most programs fall into one of three basic categories:

1. The program which combines study in a foreign institution with courses arranged for the group. The largest number of programs fall in this class. U.S. students enroll for part of their studies in a foreign institution. They may take regular university courses, special university courses for foreign students, courses in a specialized institution (e.g., a teachers' college, an art school, or a scientific research center), or courses in a private institution offering special programs for foreign students. The courses arranged especially for the U.S. group may be taught either by regular U.S. faculty from the home campus or by foreign and U.S. faculty members engaged by the program sponsors.

The advantage of this type of program is that it offers students the opportunity to study in a foreign institution while helping them meet the requirements of their own degree programs through the U.S. courses. It also offers students readily available help with any difficulties they may encounter in the foreign classes.

Participants in these programs are nearly always required to have some knowledge of the language of the country. When foreign-institution classes are in programs especially designed for foreigners, language requirements are less exacting than they are for regular university classes. A number of U.S. programs offer students a choice of foreign institutions, depending on the level of their language skills.

2. The program which is fully integrated into a foreign university or other university-level institution. In these, the student is fully enrolled in the foreign institution and takes a complete academic program there. (Such programs may provide supplemental tutorials conducted by U.S. faculty members.) This type of program calls for a high degree of language competence. The student must be able to follow lectures and take examinations along with natives of the country. These programs offer a high level of challenge to students able to accept it. Those who enroll in programs of this kind must be especially careful in arranging to take on the home campus all required courses they cannot take abroad, since they will not have the opportunity to take any U.S. courses overseas.

3. The "island" program. All courses are taught by faculty members of the sponsoring U.S. institution and by foreign faculty engaged specifically for the program. Students live together in housing leased by the sponsor.

The advantage of this type of program is that the sponsoring U.S. institution has as much control over the nature and quality of instruction as it has at home. Also, for the student without a fairly good command of a foreign language, such programs offer the only opportunity for meaningful study abroad. (Many such programs offer intensive language study.) The chief disadvantage of this type of program is that the U.S. students are isolated from the foreign academic milieu and may find themselves isolated socially as well. In the decade immediately following World War II, when the number of U.S. college-sponsored programs abroad began to grow rapidly, a large proportion of U.S. programs abroad were of this type. Their relative numbers have declined, however, as more and more schools have worked to develop programs which offer at least some courses in a foreign institution.

Nearly all of the programs listed fall into one of these three categories. A few programs listed represent independent study opportunities. In some of these, exceptionally well-qualified students—with prior approval of their advisers or department chairmen—carry out research projects abroad and receive credit from their home institutions. In others, U.S. students—again with prior approval—may enroll individually in foreign universities and receive credit from their own U.S. schools for course work abroad. All such arrangements are made on an individual basis by the students and their schools. Many U.S. colleges and universities other than the ones listed may offer these opportunities.

Sponsorship

Many study-abroad programs are sponsored cooperatively by groups of U.S. institutions. Some are administered through central consortium offices. Others are administered by the participating schools; often they rotate central responsibility from year to year. One advantage, for students, of such multi-institutional programs is that they can offer instruction in specialized fields, whereas a single school might not have enough study-abroad candidates in that field to warrant a program. An advantage for schools, U.S. and foreign alike, is that cosponsorship cuts down on duplicate faculty and administrative work. Consortia with large numbers of participating schools are listed, with their member institutions, in Appendix A. Cosponsoring institutions of programs with five or fewer sponsors are listed in the individual entries. There is an index of all sponsoring institutions beginning on page 214.

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

The listing of study-abroad opportunities was derived from direct communication with officials of each school. Respondents were asked to describe, by questionnaire and supportive materials, their own programs, or programs they participate in. (In spite of the repeated mailings, it is inevitable that some programs have been missed.)

All programs are listed alphabetically by the region, country, and city in which they are held. Entries include the name and address of the sponsoring school (or schools, if the program has several sponsors), and offer brief but specific information on the following points:

① Year program was established. This information, if it was provided by the sponsor, appears in parentheses, after the program title (if any), and before the program description.

② Location. The programs are grouped by the country and the city where resident study is to take place. Programs which offer study in more than one country are listed at the beginning of each regional grouping. Programs to be held in more than one city of the same country are listed at the beginning of the country groupings.

Some programs include travel to other cities or countries, and a number offer pre-session orientation in cities other than those in which resident study is held. These facts are noted in the entries, but the programs are listed under the country and city where the major portion of study will take place.

③ Dates and duration. If the information was provided, the entries give the dates of the program and whether terms are semester, quarter, or trimester. If the program is more than one term long, the entries note whether students must enroll for the entire period or whether they may enroll for a single term.

This information is based on a survey conducted in September, 1983, for programs to begin in September, 1984, and later. In many cases, specific dates were not firm at the time the survey was taken, and they are subject to change.

④ Pre-session orientation. There is a surprising variation both in orientation locales and in orientation procedures. Orientation often begins several days before the group is to leave the United States. Orientation can also begin after the group has left the United States, either in the city abroad where the program is to be held, or in a city (or country) abroad having little or nothing to do with either the focus of the academic program, or the culture of the program's host city. Orientation abroad is far less frequent than orientation in the U.S.; some schools are, however, combining the two, holding it both in the U.S. and abroad.

The sessions can be led by U.S. or foreign faculty members, former participants, the program's director, or any combination thereof. Most orientation sessions provide information on the history of the area to be visited and on the cultural differences between the foreign land and the United States, but some programs also offer language courses and may require preliminary readings.

Pre-session orientation can also be done by mail. Usually passport, visa and personal information (such as the need for inoculations) is sent to the student upon acceptance into the program.

⑥ Fields of study. Most programs offer courses in the language, history, and culture of the country where the program is held. Increasingly, however, study-abroad programs are being offered in other specific disciplines, e.g., archaeology, urban affairs, educational methods, etc. A fields-of-study index for these other specific disciplines can be found on pages 221-225. Space limitations have forced us to keep the fields-of-study index quite short; students may have to use their imagination when looking up such fields as folklore (it is under Mythology), or television (look under Media). Internships, if available, are noted.

Undergraduates considering study abroad should take care to make sure that they will be able to take all the required courses for their degrees during the normal four years of undergraduate work. For students majoring in a foreign language, there is usually no problem. Students in other disciplines should plan well ahead to make sure they can take, on the home campus, all the required courses that they cannot take abroad.

D Academic level. The entries indicate whether each program is open to freshmen, sophomores, juniors, seniors, or graduates. If a program is open to undergraduates at all levels, the entry will simply say "undergraduates." Relatively few programs are open to freshmen. Many are open to sophomores and juniors. A fairly large number are open to seniors, although many institutions prefer that those who are about to graduate take at least their last semester in resident study on the home campus.

Most programs listed are for undergraduates. A few are for graduates only. Some programs for undergraduates accept graduate students but do not award graduate credit. "Graduate credit" is indicated in the entries if the information was provided. Often graduate students take undergraduate study-abroad courses to meet a language requirement, to do research, or for general enrichment. Some programs are also open to pre-college students—usually students who have a high school diploma and have already been accepted at a U.S. college. And a few are open to interested adults, on a no-credit basis.

D Credits. The number of credits awarded for successful completion of the program is given in the entries. Depending on the sponsor's academic year, these credits may be quarter hours, semester hours, or trimester hours.

For students enrolled in programs of the institution from which they expect to graduate, the question of credit poses no particular problem. Students who wish to enroll in programs sponsored by other schools, however, should investigate the credit requirements of their own schools in advance. Quarter-hour credits may have to be translated into equivalent semester-hour values, and vice versa. Many institutions require seniors to do their last semester or year of work on the home campus in order to graduate. Sometimes those who study abroad may miss out on required courses which they must take to graduate.

Please Note: Acceptance of transfer credit is always the prerogative of the accepting (or rejecting) school. All the sponsors listed in this book are recognized U.S. institutions, and their credits are basically eligible for transfer. However, there may be grade-level or field-of-study restrictions or other requirements applicable to transfer credit. It is essential, therefore, to check with your own school about acceptance of credits.

D Prerequisites. Specific academic and language prerequisites are listed in the entries. Most institutions call for at least a C average and some prior study of the language of the country. (The abbreviation G.P.A. is used for grade-point average.) Some programs have no language prerequisite at all. The information about prerequisites given in the entries is necessarily brief. The program sponsors will provide more details on request.

D Instruction. The entries indicate whether students attend regular academic courses at a foreign institution, special courses for foreign students at a foreign institution, and/or courses arranged for the group and taught by U.S. and/or foreign faculty.

As pointed out earlier, regular academic courses in a foreign university call for excellent command both of the foreign language and of the subject matter of the course. Students in these programs usually have an extremely wide choice of subject matter; often they may choose from all the course offerings of the university. (Sometimes enrollment in laboratory-science courses is limited, and some foreign universities restrict admission to certain particularly overcrowded courses.) This means that they will be studying regular university-level subjects along with students who are nationals of the country. Many foreign universities are more like U.S. graduate schools than undergraduate schools, and their methods of instruction reflect the fact. Students are given a reading list at the beginning of the course and an examination at the end of it; their progress in between is up to them. Instruction in these programs is always in the language of the country.

In many programs, U.S. students enroll in special courses for foreign students offered either by universities or by specialized institutions abroad. Most such programs offer courses in the language and culture of the country. In these programs, too, instruction is in the language of the country; the foreign students enrolled come from all over the world. However, allowances are made for the fact that the students are studying in a language not their own. These programs frequently offer intensive courses in the language of the country.

In most programs, study in a foreign institution is supplemented by courses arranged for the group and taught either by U.S. faculty or by foreign faculty engaged especially for the program. The extent of this instruction may range from tutorials supplementing the course material to extensive course work and intensive language instruction.

Some programs consist entirely of courses arranged for the group and taught by U.S. and foreign faculty. Many of these programs are taught almost entirely in English, except for the language classes. A few, however, are intensive language programs intended for students who are majoring in the language.

◊ Teaching methods. Sponsors were asked whether their programs were taught by lectures, seminars, science labs, language labs, or any variation thereof; many respondents noted that they required the student to do some independent study; sponsors of language programs indicated whether they used audio-visual methods, etc.

◊ Language of instruction. Read the section above on Instruction for a fuller understanding of this. The entries identify the language of instruction, and the prerequisites given suggest the level of competence required. It is extremely important to choose a program for which your language ability is adequate. The student who finds himself over his head in lectures in a foreign language—even if he may be able to pass a written test—will only meet discouragement and frustration while lowering his grade average.

Programs with pre-session orientation periods often include intensive language instruction. Students in doubt about their language competence should investigate the extent and intensity of the language instruction offered in the orientation portion of the study-abroad program. A number of programs offer students a selection of courses geared to their own language ability. After an orientation period, exceptionally well-qualified students may be placed in regular university courses, while those less well-qualified will be placed in less demanding classes or in intensive language courses.

◊ Housing. Most programs provide housing for members of the group, although a small number leave housing arrangements to the students themselves. (Programs which do not provide living facilities will usually provide a list of available housing in the area.) There is an acute housing shortage for students in most foreign cities and university towns. Frequently, housing arrangements are made not because they are ideal but because they are possible. A great many programs offer students a choice from among a number of possible housing arrangements. The basic types of housing are:

- Living in a residence, dormitory, or apartment, leased by the program for the use of the U.S. students, or in a hotel or pension with the rest of the U.S. group. This can offer comfort, convenience, and security, but it can tend to limit social contacts with nationals of the country.

- Living in a dormitory along with nationals of the country and other foreign students. This may be ideal for students who are interested in meeting and developing friendships with students from other countries. Such dormitory space is at a premium in most countries, however, and arrangements like these are hard to find.

- Living with a family. This can be extremely rewarding for students who are interested in meeting nationals of the country and in understanding and experiencing their lifestyle. It can be less than ideal for the natural loner or students who would prefer to spend their time doing library (or other) research at their own convenience. Living with a family can be one of the most or one of the least satisfying types of arrangements. In Europe particularly, few families open their homes to anyone except very close friends, and what is represented as a "family" may prove to be a widow with a room to rent. In cases where the families are really families, students may find themselves subject to restrictions and customs more stringent than they are used to in permissive American homes. On the other hand, living with a family can offer an unparalleled opportunity to experience another culture fully and even to develop lifelong friendships.

■ Living independently in a pension, boarding house, or hotel. This offers the student a considerable amount of freedom and provides opportunities to meet local people. The average self-reliant student may find this an ideal arrangement. The very young, immature, or shy may find it lonely or too demanding on their emotional, linguistic, or general coping resources.

◊ Travel. Most programs include, in the cost of the program, a period of program-related group travel either within the country to be visited or to other countries. At times the travel is an optional part of the program. This is noted briefly in the entries; more details can be obtained from the program sponsors. Also, many programs provide some free time during which the student may travel independently.

◊ Costs. All the costs given are subject to changes in foreign-currency exchange rates and to inflation.

The costs quoted for most programs include transportation to and from the U.S., tuition, fees, room and board, and program-related travel. When a single figure is given in an entry after "cost," the figure given includes all of these items. When the cost given does not include all of these items (for example, when the figure given does not include transportation, housing, or meals), the exclusions are noted in the entry. Unless otherwise indicated, the figures given do not include the student's personal expenses or independent travel. Program sponsors will usually provide an estimate of how much spending money the average student will need.

In programs sponsored by public colleges and universities, there is usually the same differential between tuition fees for state residents and for nonresidents as there is for study on the home campus. This information is noted in the entries if it was provided. Occasionally, graduate students have to pay an additional fee; when provided, this information was noted in the entries.

◊ Scholarships. The word "scholarships" in the entries indicates that there are special scholarships available for the program. Write to the sponsor for additional information. In addition, many schools permit students who hold regular university scholarships to use them for their own schools' study-abroad programs. Inquire about this on your own campus.

◊ Work abroad. All the work opportunities are program related in the sense that the program sponsor places the student in the position. In general, work opportunities are either study-related, such as language tutoring; assistants on the study-abroad program, such as clerical aides; or independent of the program, such as waiters. The positions usually are temporary and part time, pay minimal salaries (if any), and are not plentiful. Students should not expect very much help in cutting their expenses abroad through monies earned on one of these jobs.

◊ Post-session program evaluation. Sponsors were asked whether they evaluate their program, how they evaluate it (student surveys, visits to program sites, outside evaluators, etc.), and, whether the evaluation is available to interested potential program participants. (Our surveys found that most programs are regularly evaluated, but it did not follow that these evaluations were available to potential participants.) If the program is evaluated and available, the entry will describe the evaluation methods and have the word "available" at the end of the sentence. If the program is evaluated but not available to outsiders, only a listing of methods will appear.

◊ Application deadlines. In most cases, these deadlines are for the receipt of completed applications with all necessary supportive material: transcripts, recommendations, deposits, etc. Therefore, it is important to write to the sponsor for information and application material well in advance of the deadline given.

Sometimes programs will admit students after the deadline is past. If a program has room for 26 students, and 24 are enrolled by the deadline, two late applicants may find themselves in luck. However, it is best not to count on luck but to begin the application procedure as early as possible.

IMPORTANT

These entries are based on questionnaires sent in September, 1983, to U.S. colleges and universities listed in Accredited Institutions of Postsecondary Education. Programs and Candidates 1982-1983 (published for the Council on Postsecondary Accreditation by the American Council on Education). The Institute of International Education does not attempt to evaluate programs. Inclusion of a program in this book does not imply IIE recommendation, nor does omission imply IIE disapproval.

WORLDWIDE

1 Antioch University. Antioch International, Yellow Springs, Ohio 45387; Individualized M.A. Program. (1974). In country of student's choice. Fifteen to thirty-nine months. Specializations in humanistic psychology, peace studies, creative writing; interdisciplinary programs. Graduates. 60 quarter hours' credit. Students may attend courses arranged for the group taught by U.S. faculty. Teaching methods include lectures, seminars, independent study, science labs, language labs. Includes optional program-related travel. Cost: $7,550 for full M.A. program (does not include housing, meals). Scholarships. Work opportunities available; internships. Post-session program evaluation: student and faculty committee surveys, visits to sites abroad; available. Apply (by March 15 for scholarships) to Individualized M.A. Program.

2 Azusa Pacific University. Azusa, Calif. 91702; Operation Impact. (1973). Ecuador, Bolivia, Guatemala, Peru, Taiwan, Japan, Philippines, New Guinea, Africa. Academic year. Includes one-week pre-session orientation on-site abroad led by U.S. faculty member. Education, human growth and development, psychology, human resource leadership, sociology. Undergraduates, graduates (preferred). Graduate credit. 36 credits. Teaching methods include lectures. Housing in dormitories. Post-session program evaluation: student and faculty committee surveys.

3 Beloit College. Beloit, Wis. 53511; World Outlook Program. (1960). In France (Rennes), Spain (Granada), Germany (Hamburg), possibly Belize and Costa Rica. January to April. Includes pre-session orientation in U.S. led by program director, former participants, U.S. faculty member; passport, personal, academic information, cross-cultural training. Intermediate and advanced language, culture, civilization, art history, international relations, philosophy; internships/summer work available. Sophomores, juniors, seniors, graduates. No graduate credit. 4 credits. 2.5 G.P.A., language capability required. Students attend courses arranged for the group taught by foreign faculty and special courses for foreigners. Teaching methods include lectures, seminars, independent study. Housing with families. Includes one to two weeks of program-related travel within the host country. Cost: $4,629 (does not include round-trip transportation). Post-session program evaluation: student and faculty committee surveys, evaluation by program leader. Rolling admissions; outside students must apply by June 1 to Ronald Rossner, Director, World Outlook Program.

4 Boston College. Chestnut Hill, Mass. 02167; Overseas/Out-of-State Student Teaching Program. (1972). Ireland, England, Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Hong Kong. Sept. 7 to May 11; students may enroll for either semester. Includes eight-meeting pre-session orientation in U.S. led by program director and former program participant; general information. Own students only. Internships. Student teaching practicum. Seniors, professionals. 12 credits. Cost: $300 per semester (does not include tuition, round-trip transportation, housing, meals). Post-session program evaluation: visits to overseas sites; available. Apply by March 1 to National/International Field Programs.

5 California State University. International Programs, Office of the Chancellor, 400 Golden Shore, Long Beach, Calif. 90802; CSU International Programs. (1963). About July to June. Students must enroll for entire program. California State University students only. Cultural and area studies; most subject fields available if student has sufficient language ability. Juniors, seniors, graduates. Minimum of 30 credits for entire program. Overall 2.75 G.P.A. required, 3.0 for programs in Brazil,

YOU WILL FIND THE ANSWERS to many of your questions in the introductory material.

New Zealand, Peru, Israel, United Kingdom, Canada, all business programs; language proficiency required for programs in Brazil, France, Germany (Heidelberg), Mexico, Peru, Spain. Students attend regular courses at host university, special courses for foreigners, and courses arranged for the group taught by foreign faculty. Housing in dormitories, student residences, apartments, boarding houses, with families. Cost: from $4,500-$8,900. Financial aid. Post-session program evaluation: student and faculty committee surveys, visits to sites abroad, evaluation by program leader. APPENDIX A

Consortia

The following are large groups of U.S. institutions which cooperate in sponsoring programs. This is by no means a complete list of such cooperative arrangements. A number of programs are sponsored by two or three U.S. institutions. In these cases, sponsors are listed in the individual entries.

Many U.S. colleges and universities will give credit for successful completion of programs sponsored by foreign institutions or private organizations. Students should investigate these possibilities with their own school. Students who wish to receive credit for any course conducted by any institution other than one in which they are enrolled should investigate their own school's credit requirements in advance.

There is an index of all sponsoring institutions beginning on page 214.

INDEX II: Fields of Study

The following index directs the reader to specialized fields as reported in the survey on which this book was based. The responses were necessarily brief (and, if not, the editors made them brief) and not necessarily uniform. It will repay the reader to pick out the countries in which he or she is interested and to read the individual entries.

Programs devoted to the study of the language, literature, history, or culture of the countries in which they are held are not indexed. They can be found in the main body of this booklet under geographical headings.

References are to program numbers, not page numbers.
